MANAGER'S COMMENTS

August started with significant declines as markets were jolted with the higher than forecast US July Unemployment Rate leading to speculation that the US economy was heading for a recession. The Magnificent Seven dropped nearly 10% in the first week. The volatility was also exacerbated with significant unravelling of the Yen trade as the BOJ announced they will raise their interest rates to cool inflation expectations in Japan.

Nonfarm payrolls rose by just 114,000, well below the 175,000 estimate, while the unemployment rate increased to 4.3%. The weak job reports heightened expectations of a higher Federal Reserve rate cut, with markets briefly pricing in a 70% chance of a 50bps cut in September. However, the market quickly rebounded as risk sentiments eased, with the Federal Reserve signaling that rate cuts will definitely happen in September. Fed Chair Jerome Powell emphasized labor market strength as the main factor of a rate cut abetted by core CPI data showed a decelerating pace of inflation. Treasury markets rallied, marking their fourth consecutive monthly gain, while defensive sectors like utilities and healthcare outperformed. Earnings reports for Q2'24 were mixed, with 49% of S&P 500 companies beating revenue estimates and 80% exceeding EPS expectations.

Technology and Financials led earnings growth, while Materials and Industrials posted declines. Market sentiment gradually improved as US PMI data showed the US still in expansionary mode with the labor market still tight.
